THE GAME COMMISSION.
The sportsmen of this vicinity have no sympathy with the attacks on the Fish and Game commission which are being made by certain Portland interests. According to the best information the reports are actuated by malice and have been made in complete ignorance of the facts.

Charges that the commission has neglected the welfare of the sportsmen for the benefit of the commercial fishing interests have no weight in this section. The commission has not only recognized the tremendous importance of the fishing in the Deschutes and neighboring lakes by carefully studying its needs, but also it has supplied us with annual carloads of young trout for planting. In addition it is just now beginning the operation of a model hatchery which should make us independent of the shipments from Bonneville and insure a constant supply of fish.

To an outsider it looks as though some one with a very dull axe to grind thought he saw an opportunity in the accession of a new governor to stir things up. We believe that Governor Olcott's investigations will satisfy him that the present commission is doing a hard job well.

club of the hearty co-operation of the Astoria Chamber of Commerce in any Central Oregon plans of statewide interest, and declared that if every city in the United States had as live an organization as the Bend club there would be no danger of the spread of Bolshevism.

Mr. Gleason, who has been traveling over the state for several years as a part of his official duties, declared that Bend is one of three cities in Oregon which have shown growth and improvement during the past year.

R.A. Ward gave suggestions as to the main things to be considered in the establishment of a woolen mill here, basing his remarks on a recent conference with a representative of the Portland Wool Warehouse Co. Second hand machinery was advised against, while the labor problem was declared to be one of the greatest difficulties. A mill of the proper size for Bend, Mr. Ward stated, would afford work for 110 employes in the daytime and 65 at night, handling approximately 3,000,000 pounds of grease wool in the course of a year. Cheap electrical power, he said would be Bend's chief advantage in starting an industry of the kind.

Dad insists boy stop seeing mom's ex following divorce

Dear Abby: My ex-husband raised my son. Now my son's biological father is saying he wants our son to stay away from my ex-husband. However, my ex-husband and my son have a strong bond. The bond is stronger than what he has with his biological father.

They are good dads, but my ex-husband devotes more time to my son than his biological father. Must I distance him from my ex since we are no longer married? My son is now 6.

ther may sense that his son isn't as bonded to him as he is to his former stepdad, which is why he is saying this. I have always believed that more love and positive reinforcement is better than less. By that, I mean I see no reason why you cannot expose your child to anyone you wish, including your former husband. Because you are confused about what your rights are as a mother, discuss this with an attorney.

Dear Abby: We have some new neighbors, and recently the wife has developed the habit of "dropping by." It is becoming apparent that she'd like to develop a social relationship — lunches, etc. — but this is NOT something I want to encourage.

My husband and I are extremely private people. What socializing we do is with family. We are willing to be good neighbors but are not interested in further involvement. In fact, we are beginning to view her visits as intrusive.

I am unsure how to approach this without offending her and appearing to be rude. Abby, you have a way of phrasing things in a positive manner, and I'd appreciate your insight as to how I can let her know her visits are not welcomed and we prefer not to establish anything beyond a cordial neighbor relationship.

— Private in the Southeast
Dear Private: Phrase it this way: "We realize you are new in town and are reaching out, but my husband and I are very private people and we social-ize only with family." Then suggest some options available in your community that will provide her an opportunity to get involved and meet new people.

Dear Abby: I have a suggestion for "Still Grieving in Montana" (Jan. 5), who found out only after the death of her brother that he was homeless. She was grieving with the thought that she had been unable to help him.

I would suggest from now on she make it a point to help other homeless men. A way to do that would be by visiting a local homeless center and doing whatever she can to lend a hand. Rather than spend more money on therapists, assisting people who need it may not only make her feel better, but also benefit the community in an important and meaningful way.

— East Windsor, N.J., Reader
Dear Reader: Channeling grief into an activity can be therapeutic and can lessen depression. Thank you for writing. I'm glad you suggested it.
